Fish As Food V1 Dec 13 2020 Fish as Food, Volume I: Production, Biochemistry, and Microbiology discusses progress in the field of fish research. This volume is composed of 17 chapters that cover the biology, biochemistry, world production, cultivation, nutritional composition, and microbiology of fish. The introductory chapters present some examples of the biological basis for the relationships between yield in fishery and economics. The book goes on discussing fish cultivation in Europe, Japan, and South East Asia and the factors to consider in various cultivation methods. The subsequent chapters are devoted to the nutritional value of fish, including its lipid, mineral, water, fatty acid, and protein content. A chapter considers the oxidation properties and rancidity of fish. The book also covers some problems related to fishery business, such as the production of histamine, the occurrence of non-protein nitrogenous compounds, and the rigor mortis. The concluding chapters focus on microbiological aspects of fish production. Discussions on the microbial spoilage of marine fish, crustaceans, and mollusks; the microbiology of shellfish deterioration; and the use of chemical preservatives to control microbiological fish deterioration are also included. The book is an invaluable source primarily to food scientists and also to a wide range of research workers, including biologists, chemists, bacteriologists, parasitologists, oceanographers, nutritionists, and technologists.

The Allied Occupation and Japan's Economic Miracle Nov 11 2020 There is a substantial body of literature dealing with the Occupation of Japan; yet hardly any of it has addressed the significance of the considerable contributions in science and technology to Japan's startling economic progress - contributions made possible in large measure by the Scientific and Technical Division of General MacArthur's Occupation Headquarters. This book chronicles their story and provides a full answer to the Big Question: Did the Japanese have or were near to having an Atomic Bomb? Apart from their immediate task of reviewing the status of Japan's science and technology at the beginning of the Occupation, the Scientific and Technical Division set about encouraging the formation of new national bodies for science and technology and persuaded the Japanese government to create new and more efficient means of dealing with technological matters, including industrial matters, quality control, patents and other intellectual property, and rendered aid in many other ways to Japan's engineers and scientists.
